II. INTRODUCTIONS

Everyone present introduced him/herself.

COUNCIL PROGRAM

Colleen Wieck provided information about the most recent Minnesota Student Survey that was conducted in 2016. The report included the prevalence of various types of abuse among special education and non-special education students. Types of bullying behaviors and harassment were reported. There are 68,000 respondents without disabilities in Minnesota’s public schools, and 10,000 to 11,000 students with disabilities who responded to the survey.

Regarding bullying and harassment, data showed that the incidence is four times greater for students with disabilities than for students without disabilities, the highest of all comparative data. This includes physical abuse by another student, although it’s not known if the other student might be a special education student; threatening behavior; and students with disabilities threatened by another student.

We were hoping to breakdown data by school to determine what differences there might be in those schools where the Ambassadors for Respect are teaching but, because schools are not specifically identified, we were not able to do so.

Mary Raasch initially brought the idea of an anti-bullying project to the Council and asked about funding. The Anti-Bullying Campaign has been financially supported by the Council since 2014. The number of participating schools has increased each year.

We invited Colleen Timbers, and Abby Hansen and John Cundy, two of the Ambassadors for Respect, to talk about the project, the training sessions with the students, and what they and the students have learned.

Colleen Timbers thanked the Council for the opportunity to present about the project, and giving the Ambassadors the chance to talk about their roles and responsibilities in preparing for and teaching in the classrooms. Timbers said that her role has faded considerably over time.
The Ambassadors have taken the lead in planning the presentations, the activities that are included in the presentations to help students apply their learning, and what they want students to come away with as a result of the training sessions. Timbers said that their self confidence has increased significantly, they are delivering powerful presentations, and the schools couldn’t be more pleased and are anxious to continue these sessions for fourth grade students the following year.

One of their recent training sessions was in a classroom with a substitute teacher who was having a difficult time getting the classroom focused; one student was particularly disruptive. Timbers and the Ambassadors for Respect handled the situation quickly, and the training continued without missing a beat.

Abby and John shared their classroom experiences with the students. They introduce the sessions by stating that the disrespectful language that is still being used has come from the past. They want the students to be engaged in the learning process, and come away with the advocacy skills and confidence to address and deal with bullying.

The decision to focus on fourth grade students was intentional. These are still the formative years. Once students reach fifth grade, they are into a different phase of development and bullying behavior increases. An incident in a fifth grade gym class last year resulted in a request by the school principal for the Ambassadors to return; they had done a training session the previous year when these students were fourth graders but it was time to deliver those positive messages again.

The participating schools were identified; many have been involved since the project but new schools have been added each year. The 2014 school year was a bad weather year; sessions had to be rescheduled later in the school year. The decision was made not to do assembly type trainings to make up for scheduling issues because they wouldn’t be able to tell what learning had actually occurred.

Abby and John talked about the classroom activities. Abby said when the students are learning about People First language, this start to see differences for the first time and the abilities that each person has. She also talked about the “crushed Charlie” activity where students are asked to place themselves in the shoes of others who are being bullied and then asked how they think that person may feel. John talked about shredding hurtful words; he asks students how they feel after that activity. One student said “it was good to get those out of my system.”
They both agreed that the stories are the most important. They both have experienced bullying. John said he was called names in school and was home schooled as a result. He encourages people not to name call because names can really hurt.

Students are also asked to take a Pledge to get rid of hurtful words, use People First language, speak out, and try to stop hurtful language that’s used by others. Abby and John then asked Council members to recite the Pledge.

Monthly evaluation reports are prepared. Students evaluate the training sessions based on knowledge gained, usefulness, and quality of the presentations; on average over the years, the rating has been 4.85 on a 1 to 5 scale. The Ambassadors also evaluate themselves in terms of IPSII; this past year, that rating was 5.

Timbers talked about the project’s four year partnership with PeaceMaker Minnesota to create a safe environment in 29 participating schools. Twelve schools are supported by the Council’s grant. St. John the Baptist received funding from PeaceMaker Minnesota this year as a result of funding success with Give to the Max.

Timbers emphasized that this is not just an activity. This is about creating a culture – a safe, healthy, and respectful environment for all students. Banners throughout the schools carry a safe harbor message.

Bottelson asked if they are looking for more people to teach in the classroom as she would be very interested; Timbers said that some of the students have also asked the same question.

In response to Quilleash’s question about the number of Ambassadors who are teaching sessions, Timbers said they now have a pool of six. There were 12 Ambassadors at one time but people are getting jobs and don’t have the time to commit to the project.

Onyeneho asked how they have gotten into the school districts. Timbers said that much depends on the principal and school administrators; the teachers are the cheerleaders.

Abby offered that she has moved on with her life. She’s moved into a townhome, cooks, cleans, and does her own laundry.

Raasch asked how the Ambassadors feel after doing so many presentations, do they feel rushed or confident? John said that he goes to his room and crashes after being on his feet all day long. Timbers added that they may do three to five presentations a day. Their endurance is amazing; they get a lot of support from each other.

Wieck said that between now and June 30, 2017, we will document as much as possible and create a replication package. Next steps will include building in quality improvement ideas, and assuring that the values that have guided and contributed to the success of this project remain.

Nancy Miller suggested having TPT do a promo.

Onyeheho asked if the trainings have to be in the schools. Timbers said it depends on how funds can be used. The curriculum is set; dollars are now spent for the classroom activities. They have presented to Rotary Clubs and churches.

Everyone was thanked for their presentation and the work that has been done in the schools to date.

VIII. EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR’S REPORT

Colleen Wieck provided the following updates and highlights from monthly reports:

1. The Department of Administration released new website branding; rollout is underway.

2. Almost 60 applications have been received by the Governor’s Office for open Council positions; some are paper applications and some have been submitted online. The new website for the Secretary of State’s Office, Open Appointments page, has been difficult to use.

3. Regarding budget issues, state funding is level at $74,000; some reductions are expected at the federal level.

4. A status conference regarding the Jensen Settlement Agreement was held on January 5, 2017. A court order was issued requiring all reports to be submitted according to schedule with no changes to the evaluation criteria. The Olmstead status conference will be held in March.

5. The Olmstead Subcabinet meets monthly. The amendment process for measurable goals is underway. An amended version of the Olmstead Plan is due the end of February.

6. Ed Roberts’ Day was January 23rd. Google requested licensing of some of Ed’s quotes; a Google Doodle was released instead for Ed’s birthday. There was a significant increase in the Council website visitor traffic and page views as a result of the Doodle.

7. Duchess Harris, a Partners graduate and professor at Macalester College, co-authored a book, Hidden Human Computers. The book tells the story of her grandmother and 11 other African American women who performed the mathematical calculations for NASA engineers with the space program. These women were hidden away because of their race. A program and book signing were held at the Science Museum of Minnesota in January.

8. MarketResponse International will be conducting a 55 year measurement of attitudes about people with developmental disabilities. The original survey was done in 1962. When this followup survey was being considered, Nancy Miller suggested that we pivot to 21st Century language.

Class 34 Partners were invited to participate in a pre-questionnaire; qualitative interviews are underway to finalize language in survey questions.

9. Several CLEs are being planned:
   a. Robins Kaplan is sponsoring a Disability Justice Seminar on March 30, 2017, “Abuse and Neglect of Individuals with Disabilities;”
   b. The University of Minnesota School of Law has scheduled a CLE panel discussion for April 4, 2017, “Sex Trafficking of Persons with Disabilities;”
   c. A list of topics and speakers has been provided to the Attorney General’s Office for a CLE on May 9, 2017 for Elimination of Bias credit.
